Shreveport. 130 miles above Alexandria.

Admiral Porter's ironclads, in spite of the exceptionally low water in the river, succeeded in passing the rapids near Alexandria and accompanied the army in its march to the interior. A number of the transports, bearing part of the men from Sherman's army, followed the gunboats.

Gen. Banks' army was defeated by the Confederates under Gen. Richard 'ay-lor—son of Zachary Taylor, tweifth President of the United States—in the battle of Sabine Cross Roads, June 8. It fell back to Alexandria. Admiral Porter was notified of the defeat of the army and attempted to return to Alexandria, bution reaching the rapids, which were just above the town, he found that the water had fallen so low that it was impossible for his heavy ironclads to pass below.

This was made of fleavy timbers, their tops upstream and the interstices filled in with stones. Four large navy coal barges were the filled with stone and brick and sunk at the end of the structure. From the left and south bank of the stream a series of cribs, constructed from material obtained by demolishing some old mills and barns in the vicin-ity, was run out to meet the barges. These cribs were filled with brick. fron and stone and sunk in position In this work colored regiments were

Many of the men had little faith in the success of the undertaking, yet they labored faithfully, and often were in water up to their waists for hours at a time. Gen. J. G. Wilson, at that time a member of Gen. Hanks' staff. thus told of the scenes along the river bank while the work was in progress. "Oak, elm and pine trees, whose gi-gantic growth dated from the days of the daring De Soto, were falling to the ground under the blows of the stalwart planers of Maine, bearing with them in their fall trees of lesser growth; mules mid oxen were drag-ging the trees, denuded of their branches, to the river's bank; wagons heavily loaded were moving in every direction; flat boats carrying stone were floating with the current, while others were being drawn up the stream in the manner of canal boats.

"Meanwhile hundreds of men were at work at each end of the dam, mov-ing heavy logs to the outer and of the
